Transshipping LNG

As LNG supply increases worldwide, greater opportunities arise to transship the liquid via ship, barge, truck and possibly rail. Japan for decades has broken and transshipped large cargoes of LNG into smaller quantities via shuttle tankers and trucks to make coastal and inland deliveries feasible. At Spanish LNG import terminals, it is the truck loadout facilities that are commonly most constrained as trailers queue in long lines to transport LNG to downstream markets. China is very interested in LNG transport and is reported to have constructed LNG railcars for gas delivery to remote power stations. Likewise in the Northeast U.S. around the Everett terminal, the nation's largest transport fleet allows the Distrigas terminal to effectively spread and multiply its storage capacity across twenty or more satellite peaking facilities.
